Vendors Pulling Double Duty

If you have never worked on or around a farm it may be difficult to imagine the preparation it takes to pick, wash, box and load the truck that morning for an afternoon market such as ours. Well at least five of our vendors are starting Tuesdays a lot earlier than usual as they now serve the University of South Carolina's market in the morning before coming to our location. Kudos to The Veggie Patch, January Remington, Congaree Milling, Trail Ridge Farms and Asya's Organic for going that extra mile and supporting USC's effort to supply the students with healthy alternatives and SC products.

Support Your Local Farmers Markets

While we hope to see you every Tuesday afternoon during the season there are other Farmers Markets in the area which need your support. You will find many of our vendors at these fine markets as well.

Gardening Tips

Dr. Timothy Davis, Richland County Extension Agent

I've been enjoying the cooler days we have been getting over the past few days. As an entomologist and a County Extension Agent cooler weather is also when the calls about occasional invaders begins. I fully expect the invasions to begin some time in the next couple of weeks.

What are occasional invaders? That is what we entomologist call those outside insects that find their way into our homes when the weather cools. It usually starts when the nights get into the mid 50's. The most common calls are for multicolored Asian lady beetles, smoky brown cockroaches, and in recent years we've added kudzu bugs and brown marmorated stink bugs.

The lady beetles, the kudzu bugs and the stink bugs are all invasive species. The lady beetles are beneficial insect predators most of the year, but become problematic when they enter our homes in large numbers looking for a place to over winter. Kudzu bugs and stink bugs are growing to become major agricultural pests.

Control of these insects when they enter your home can be problematic. Most insecticides are limited in their effectiveness. In fact, vacuuming them regularly is one of the best management tools. They can survive being vacuumed so be sure to remove the vacuum bag. They can also produce a fowl odor if you don't remove them.

The good thing is that these occasional invaders don't pose a health risk nor do they damage the structure of your homes. That isn't to reduce the importance of the nuisance factor that they represent. For more information on these occasional invaders visit the Clemson Home and Garden Information center online at: hgic.clemson.edu I will also post links on my blog and Facebook pages.
